Smelly Crayons Jul 07 2020 Smelly Crayons is a story based on a true story. My daughter, Brittany, was six years old when this story was written. When she finished her chores, I took her to the store to buy new crayons, a coloring book, and a new purple crayon box. She picked her crayons and a four-seasons coloring book. After all, it was November of 1997. She thought the coloring book was perfect. We looked for a purple crayon box and found one. Brittany was very happy. When we returned home, she quickly opened her crayons and took the paper off all the crayons. She placed them in her new purple box. She took out her bright-colored pink crayon. She started to color the bunny rabbit. She noticed that what she colored smelled. She took the paper off the crayon, and she had no idea what the scent it had was called. She took a good sniff and said, "I know, hot-pink bubblegum." I thought that would make a great story, and that was how Smelly Crayons was born. Please enjoy.

Two - For Crayons and Wide Tipped Markers Jan 13 2021 One day, as I was restacking my ever growing mountain of sketchbooks and papers packed full of tiny motifs, I realized that there will never be enough hours in the day to refine each one into polished line work and carefully balanced patterns. The rough sketches accumulate too fast - in notebooks, on the backs of envelopes, everywhere! I found myself growing increasingly unsettled until a conversation with my mother made everything crystal clear. She suggested that I make a series of books from all of these special little snippets and unpolished gems and share them as a behind the scenes peek into my private daily drawing through the years. I invite you to color along with me as I sort through sketchbook mountain and place these moments, fragments and doodles into mini galleries for us to enjoy. And while you color this set of motifs, I'll be busily tidying up my giant stash of small drawings - and creating new ones too, of course. Will I ever get caught up with all of this? Probably not, but it's going to be fun trying!
